U. C. North Hall Corner Stone Rites Recall Past

'Old Grads' Present as Relics of 1873 Are Brought to Life

BERKELEY, May 14.—The past has come to life at the University of California.

Events of the Eastbay of 58 years ago were revealed with examination of time-dimmed newspapers and records unearthed yesterday in the cornerstone of old North hall, campus building recently wrecked.

Opening of the cornerstone was an informal, merry affair attended by many of the oldest "grads" of the university, some of the youngest alumni, and President Robert Gordon Sproul and other university officials. It was a feature of the program of the sixty-eight commencement day of the state institution.

Several hundred "old grads" and other guests held their breath in anticipation while President Sproul, dropping all official dignity and becoming just "Bob" Sproul of the class of 1913, heaved on a chain hoist and lifted the granite block above the cornerstone.

COPPER BOX REVEALED

His efforts revealed the copper box which was placed in the building on May 3, 1873, when its construction was begun. And the efforts of Professor Emeritus Edmund O'Neill, graduate of the class of 1879 and veteran educator of the university, revealed the contents of the box.

His chisel and hammer opened the corner stone, and there were yellowed newspapers, pictures, and university registers which had been put there when Professor O'Neill was "Eddie," just one of 150 undergraduates on the then isolated campus.

In the box were more than a dozen newspapers of May 3, 1873, a "half dime" dated 1869, a medallion bearing the names of the 12 members of the class of 1873, university registers of 1869, '71 and '73, and several undergraduate publications of that day.

The biggest laugh the watching crowd had was when Judge Everett J. Brown of Oakland, graduate in 1897, held aloft a small booklet taken from the cornerstone and announced its title, "Rights and Conditions of Women, a woman's suffrage tract containing the sermon of the Rev. Samuel J. May."

Indian battles in Modoc county, the death of Congressman Brooks, a Mississippi tornado, and police court and Alameda grand jury reports were the leading stories in the newspapers.

INDIAN WAR NEWS.

Under the heading, "This Morning's Dispatches," one newspaper told "the latest from Modoc county," and of the expected arrival of Gen. Jeff C. Davis, who would lead the fight against the Indians. Classified advertisements on page one of the paper included those of wine and liquor stores, portable gas machines for sale, and one that announced that the advertiser would "whiten buildings."

Another story told of the troubles of Constable Enright of Livermore, who walked about town all night "to satisfy the whim" of his prisoner, an "inoffensive man who was unfortunately under the influence of liquor at the time;" Livermore had no "lock up" at the time, and the constable's walk was to keep the prisoner happy while he awaited a hearing before Justice Freeman, the story said.

Papers in the corner stone included the Daily Alta Californian, the Oakland Daily Transcript, The San Francisco Chronicle, the Daily Morning Call, the Overland Monthly, which "dealt with the development of the country," the Evening Bulletin, the Oakland Home Journal and Alameda County Advertiser, the Oakland Daily News and the Evening Torchlight.

Sale, for $25,000, of a parcel of land to George O'Nara Taaffee, Danish consul, was announced by Captain J. D. Farwell in one of the papers. The land, in Alameda near Park street, sold at $2400 an acre, the story said.

A note left in the copper box said that George Miller and his family had a "M. E. Sunday school picnic" on the site of North hall the day the corner stone "to stand for many hundreds of years" was laid.

Professor O'Neill, in an address at the ceremony, told how he stood "in trepidation on this spot" 62 years ago, when he took his university entrance examinations in North hall, then one of the two buildings on the campus.

FEW FARMS, FACTORY.

"Toward Oakland then," he said "there were only a few farms. Toward the bay there was one factory, which served its purpose best when we sent freshmen there to seek the recorder. And around here there were only the brown hills."

The age of North hall and the youth of President Sproul, now 39, was emphasized by Judge Brown, who introduced the president for his address at the exercises.

"When North hall was sagging as much as it ever sagged, and when its walls and bannisters bore as many carved initials as they could hold, there was born in San Francisco the man who is now president of the University of California," he declared.

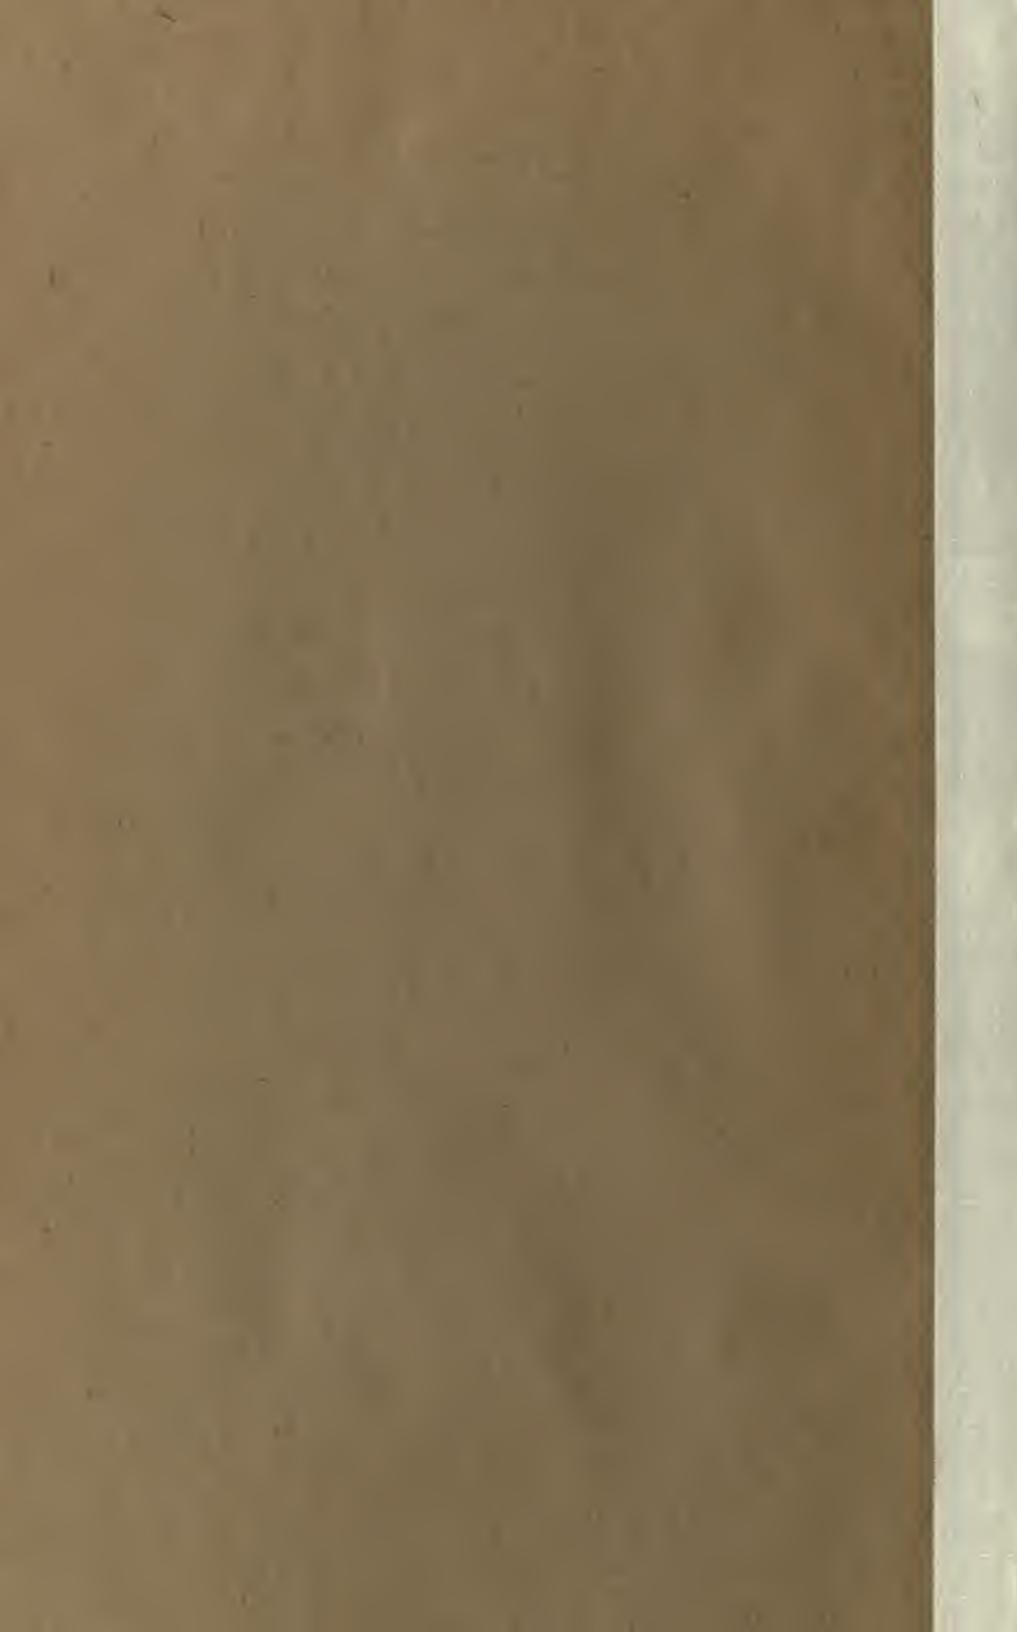

Dr. Sproul, in his address, urged the alumni to unite in support of their alma mater. Their organized efforts, he said, would aid in the university in times of stress such as that which recently occurred in the state legislature.

Other leaders at the exercises were Sumner Mering, councilor of the Alumni association; Robert Sibley, executive manager of the association; J. C. Rowell, graduate in 1874 and librarian emeritus of the university; Theodore Morgan, senior class president; Stern Altshuler and Ruth Waldo, retiring president and vice president, respectively, of the student body.
